Site 300 is an 11-square mile experimental test site located on the southwest border of Tracy. The Environmental Protection Agency put Site 300 on its "Superfund" list, one of the most contaminated sites in the country.

Toxins have been released into the air, soil, ground water and surface waters, putting the health of Site 300 workers and nearby community residents at risk. The EPA has estimated that drinking the water pumped from wells at the facility's fence line would result in one additional cancer for every hundred people drinking the water.

The plan for open-air bomb blasts that will put hazardous wastes into the air at Site 300 increases the risks we face.

We will share news & actions to take!
